

In what was to be the en suite bathroom but is now the newly decorated nursery (above) and in the bedroom (below). Viewers have knitted bonnets and booties for the baby. "I am so touched by their kindness," Kate says

...and after being rushed to hospital was told by medical staff she had probably miscarried. "I was in bits," remembers Kate. "I called Mike to break the news, he was ready to jump on the next plane home." "During the harrowing scene, Mike says: 'I was in this grotty hotel, looking at the ceiling fan going round and I felt helpless. Yet I had that instinct that, despite what the doctors had told Kate, she hadn't lost the baby after all.' Kate's inner voice proved to be right. When Kate returned to Prof. Bell the following day for an ultrasound scan, she was stunned at what she saw. "The white light - the baby - was still there," she says. "Mike looked as if he or she was looking at me. I was so elated I couldn't stop smiling. I haven't looked back since." When Mike returned home a few days later, Kate greeted him at their front door in a summer dress that hid off her burgeoning bump perfectly. "We just fell into each other's arms," she says. "At last we were going to have the baby we thought we'd never get." Kate has her own theory as to why she confounded the

Pink Tulip Cushions

Red Lotus Piqué
(front and back)